[This photograph was formerly the property of Mrs Violet M.Ponting, and was reproduced in Ponting's book "The Great White South" (1923) opposite page 179. "Osman was the head dog of the pack; and, unlike many of his subordinates - some of which would snarl at everyone except their drivers, who were ready to sink their teeth in anyone they took a dislike to - he was gentle and good natured. Osman was the dog that had been washed overboard in the gale in the Sixties, and saved by one of the seaman when carried aboard again on the crest of the next wave. He had been the fiercest dog of all, when in New Zealand; but that adventure seemed to have a sobering effect on him. Henceforth he regarded us all as friends. He was now a sociable, docile animal, and exhibited obvious pleasure when anyone exchanged a few friendly words with him. With his massive build and magnificent head, he looked every inch the chief he was; and his great strength and wonderful reasoning powers qualified him for the most important part he took in our adventure", pp. 179-80]. [This photograph was formerly the property of Mrs Violet M.Ponting, and was reproduced in Ponting's book "The Great White South" (1923) opposite page 179. "Vida, the leader of the second team, was another superb dog, with a head suggestive of a parentage of Chow and the St. Bernard. He was equally as strong as Osman, but, though as fine of appearance, he had none of Osman's amiable characteristics; he distrusted everyone, except those with whom he was brought into constant contact. Vida was a proud, and condescending creature, seemingly fully conscious of his own strength and fitness for his work; and conscious, too, of his ability to hold his own in combat with any of his associates", pp. 179-80].
